

Ambrosia deltoidei

BURSAGE

Quintessential Sonoran Desert shrub. Its small, rough leaves are grey-green to white looking. These Sonoran native plants are tough and extremely heat and drought tolerant as you would expect, however, they also adapt to and perform well on supplemental irrigation. Which landscapers and designers should be aware of, as they typically grow much larger with more lush foliage when provided with more water. This can lead them to become shorter-lived. Once they are established, offering less but strategic irrigation, especially during the hottest summer months, works best to have the healthiest, best looking plants for the longest.
