Zephyranthes candida

WHITE RAIN LILY

Dainty white crocus-like blooms above grassy foliage. These persistent perennial plants from bulbs form well-behaved clumps of short, green grass-like leaves that look similar to chives. In the Amaryllidaceae family, they can flower from fall to spring with evergreen foliage all season, but they do have the capacity to go summer dormant if they are off of regular water for a period of time. The six flower petals are bright white, 2-3 inches long and slightly pointed forming an open, cup shape. Rain lilies are good for mass plantings, borders, containers, raised beds or any small spaces or strips that may otherwise go unnoticed. They are tough, quite adaptable and require little to no maintenance. Their common name refers to their natural habit to go summer dormant, but then pop up to surprise when monsoon rain showers arrive in late summer to autumn.
